ABSTRACT

This directory lists 428 professional associations which serve two-year college student development workers. It includes 46 national, 86 regional, and 296 state and substate associations. Most entries contain the organization name, address, phone number, annual fee cost, contact person, purpose, and the persons or areas served. The result of a national survey sponsored by the American College Personnel Association, the directory is a valuable resource for all student development professionals, with listings relevant to counseling, testing and evaluation, career planning and placement, financial aid, housing, orientation, foreign students, veterans, student activities, athletics, college unions, bookstores, admissions, registration, and health services. FOREWORD

The business of leading a full life in our profession requires contact with other student development oriented individuals. Through Dr. Robert B. Young, the American College Personnel Association's Commission XI on Student Development Programs in Two-Year Colleges and the National Council on Student Development have co-sponsored a task force to compile this directory for your use. The directory should serve as a guide to individuals and organizations offering resources to the student development specialist.

A special note of thanks needs to be given to Robert Young and his colleagues at the University of Connecticut for their work on the project. Dr. Ernest Leach, formerly Commission XI Chairman, was also instrumental in finding resources to support the project. Without their efforts, there would be no directory.

It is my sincere hope that the efforts of ACPA Commission XI will add greatly to your professional life. Please contact us and get involved. Being a student development specialist begins at home.

Terry Ludwig, Chairman
Commission XI
Student Development Programs
in Two-Year Colleges

PREFACE

In February 1977, Dr. Ernest Leach, Chairperson of the A.C.P.A. Commission on Two-Year College Student Development, established a task force to investigate the associations which serve two-year college student development professionals. The primary goal of the task force was to prepare a directory of these associations, so that the professional development of two-year college staff members could be improved. The directory might spark the creation of new organizations or encourage the consolidation of old ones. Existing organizations might add new services or they might choose to delete services which were offered by other associations in their state or region.

In March 1977, 473 questionnaires were sent to: state directors of community college education; A.C.P.A. members in different states; and to selected Deans of Students at two-year colleges in each of the fifty states. Due to a limited return of these questionnaires, a postcard follow-up was initiated in June. The final return rate, twenty-four percent, was disappointing because it limited the amount and accuracy of information which could be included in the directory. However, the task force decided to produce the directory despite these limitations. The directory, even though it was a limited source of information, might be helpful to people who wanted to improve the quality or quantity of professional associations for two-year college student development workers.

The task force decided to provide as much information as possible in the directory, in essentially the same form as it was provided by the respondents to the survey. Thus, organizations have been described in essentially the same way that they were described by two-year college professionals. Also, incomplete information has been included about several associations. The task force chose to commit sins of inclusion in preparing the directory rather than sins of omission. Incomplete information might help someone. The absence of that information could help no one. In all cases, the accuracy of information was checked as completely as possible.

The directory is divided into three parts: national, regional, and state associations. Forty-six national associations are listed in the first section of the directory. For emphasis and readability, several subsidiary organizations are listed separately from their parent organizations, e.g. the National Vocational Guidance Association is listed apart from its parent, the American Personnel and Guidance Association.

Eighty-six associations serve six different regions: the East, Middle Atlantic states, the South, the Midwest, the Northwest, and the West. These associations comprise the green-colored pages of the directory. Readers are urged to check contiguous regions for the potential overlap of organizational service to states. Caesar might have been able to divide Gaul into three distinct parts, but this task force was unable to devise equally distinct regional assignments for states and professional service associations.

Descriptions of state and substate associations were received from thirty nine states. Illinois and California listed the most associations, twenty apiece, perhaps because of the numbers and traditions of their two-year colleges. However, the strength of a two-year college system does not fully explain the existence of a large number of professional associations. Connecticut, a relative newcomer to community college education, listed nineteen associations while New York and Florida, bastions of that education, listed only nine and eight associations, respectively. Thus, other factors such as economic duress, political conditions or the individual strength of a few associations might also affect the numbers of professional associations in a state.

Counseling topped the list of the state associations. Seventy-six counseling associations were described by thirty-four of the thirty-nine states. Usually more than one counseling association serves the two-year college professionals in a state. The respondents to the survey provided the following numbers of other state and substate associations: fifty-eight "general"; forty-five "admissions and records"; thirty-two "other"; and thirteen "student activities" associations. While interesting, these totals are probably unreliable because of the low return rate of the survey.

The state listings include substate associations which were reported by two-year college student development professionals. Though not solicited in the questionnaire, such associations are listed in the directory if they were reported by the respondents. The directory does not describe all of the substate organizations which serve two-year college student development professionals in the nation.

In sum, the directory lists 428 association: forty-six national, eighty-six regional, and 296 state and substate associations. The large numbers of associations indicate a broad service to two-year college professionals, especially since the actual number of associations is probably larger than 428. However, this quantity does not necessarily mean good service. Only a few of the national associations provide direct help to student development professionals in two-year colleges. Many regional and state associations for student development are controlled by school, four-year college, or university interests. "General" two-year college associations often meet the needs of administrative and instructional staff before they address the needs of student affairs personnel. Finally, the absence of "student development" from the titles of any of the state associations indicates that this idea of student growth is not being adequately addressed by those organizations. Ironically, the term, "student development", constitues a substantial part of the titles of both the Commission and National Council which have sponsored the work of this task force.

In the final analysis, this directory provides an imperfect guide to the associations which serve two-year college student development professionals. It does not adequately describe the quantity or quality of those associations. However, such imperfections do not mean that the work of the task force has been unsuccessful. The ultimate success of our work will not be determined by the pages of this directory but in the use of those pages by two-year college student development professionals. The same people who have provided the information for this directory will determine its ultimate value. That is the way it should be.

Robert B. Young

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The production of this directory would not have been possible without the assistance of many people. First and foremost, we wish to thank Dr. Ernest Leach for his initiative as Commission XI Chairperson in generating the idea and the financial resources for this project. Dr. Terry Ludwig has continued the support for the project through his leadership of Commission XI. Likewise, Dr. Mel Gay has provided the support of the National Council on Student Development for the project.

In addition to these sources of support, materials and secretarial assistance were provided by the Department of Higher, Technical, and Adult Education of the University of Connecticut. Special thanks go to Dr. Glenn Atkyns, chairman of the department, Ruth Pfeiffer, and Judith Chace for their help. Dr. Robert Miller, president of Quinebaug Valley Community College, provided the assistance of that college in the preparation and distribution of the survey questionnaire. We also wish to thank the College Theatre of Storrs for their assistance in the printing of the directory.

Finally, we wish to thank the two-year college professionals who took the time to answer the survey questionnaire. Their interest and involvement truly made the directory a reality.
